

Aight, so here's the deal. Yall are starting in a small town just below the fork of a large river, it is a quaint little area that has managed to pass unnoticed by many travelers. There are few villages and small cities near it, so folx come in and out, but most people here have lived in this town for a while, and the town as a whole has been able to find a perfect equilibrium with its environment. In this forest that seems to be the norm. People rarely go hungry, those who are sick are supported by the rest of the community, and disputes are resolved gently and peacefully. It is by no means a utopia. People struggle and suffer like you and me, but there is generally enough food and compassion to go around for everyone in the area. The desert that borders each side of the forest does not exactly echo this sentiment. The few Oases that exist are coveted and heavily monetized. This environment is harsh, and these dots of civilization are the only thing that allow people to survive, so naturally, they are guarded by those who are equally harsh. The people who live here are tough and enduring, they can withstand almost anything and have become just as stubborn as the desert they live in. However, to the east, there is a land that even they deem unlivable. The only thing there is coarse sand and dry heat that can kill humans in hours. Legends of enormous beasts capable of shaking the earth live among the orange dunes, but no one has been able to live there long enough to corroborate those stories.

Things have stayed this way for centuries, but the earth is not a static creature. Monsoon season is not exactly welcomed with open arms in the jungle, but the lack of rain all together is a troubling prospect. Dryness has started to encroach the rainforest, and the river is much lower than it should be. The line between the livable and unlivable dessert becomes blurrier and blurrier by the day. Food is far from scarce in the town you inhabit when your adventure begins, but people are nervous. The townspeople's prayers to the god of the river and rain have gone unanswered, and if things do not change soon, they might run into some issues.

Feel free to wait until our class selection session is done to write your character but if you'd like to get started I would really appreciate it if you would write about a 0.5 - 1.5 pages on who your character is

I have just 3 questions which you can include in your backstory or write separately:

- What is the name of your character
- Why is your character here in this town
- What drives your character to go out adventuring (adventuring is dangerous, most people in their right minds would not do what you do on a daily basis, why do you feel compelled to do this)
