

First off I want to say the mechanics should be a guide: You give me the vibe ur going for and we will figure out something that's right for u

Here are some in world magical events and forces that might relate to your power, tweak them however you want/ feel free to come up with something else.

Sorcery also can be a means to an end. Again, the class is a vehicle for the character, how you got your power is much less important than what you plan to do with it.

Bloodline: There is a hidden strain of royal blood among the commonfolk that could manifest sorcery at any point down the line! Your affinity to the arcane has always been potent but lately its been downright intoxicating to cast your spells. You've noticed something strange as well, in the center of your chest you are starting to feel a ... bump? Bump isn't exactly correct, but it's the best way to describe it. Every day it protrudes a little more and is starting to take form.

The False Ascension: 112 years ago a member of the royal family attempted to ascend to godhood and failed, leveling an entire city and all its inhabitants in the process. The violet church sits at the center of this city, completely unmarred from the blast. Its not its presence or your lost home that fills you with rage. It's the revelry happening within the tower walls, thousands of people eat and drink and study and experiment, unperturbed by the blight that surrounds them. Irrefutable evidence that this place should have been left alone and the studies once conducted there abandoned and forgotten. The magic crackling in your bones and burned into your flesh is a promise, a debt to be settled with those who trade in hubris.

Contact with a magic item: One of the things that is pretty integral to dnd is the presence of countless dead civilizations, their power and culture scattered to the wind. Anything and anyone can come into contact with world shattering magic. Archeologists, Graverobbers, Empires, most people with power know of an item that will give them an edge, few can resist looking. Unlikely as it seems, sometimes it falls into the hands of those with no prior knowledge of it, realizing far too late that they feel loathed to part with a trinket they nicked off a noble, especially when it begins to emit a soft whisper.

Entry into a strange land: Your boot hits the earth as you step off the train. You had seen the landscape out the window for the entire trip, but as you breathe in this new air and stare into a horizon of endless iridescent trees your body stiffens, joints lock and relax as you feel something pulse from just beyond the treeline.

Cosmos: You have always felt at home under the stars, gazing up at the ring that circles your planet. It's the end of spring, so you see it near its peak, orange and red lines trailing across the sky and reflecting what feels like light made just for you. You soak it in, feeling that all too familiar power grace your skin and shine off of you. In an instant you are sending back your own oranges and reds as great gouts of flame pour from your hand.